

Today 'man', tomorrow 'woman' – a mistake of nature?

The US-American feminist Judith Butler put forward the following claim: “There are no men, nor women- gender is culture, not nature.” One may choose to be a man or a woman and even switch between genders: today a man, tomorrow a woman.

The US-American feminist Judith Butler put forward the following claim: “There are no men, nor women- gender is culture, not nature.” One may choose to be a man or a woman and even switch between genders: today a man, tomorrow a woman. With this claim, the radical feminist laid the basis for gender ideology whose contents are unknown to 93% of people interviewed in a current survey. Marriage between a man and a woman has been the cornerstone of our families and society and secured human existence since time immemorial. Facts inherent in nature – according to which gender is determined genetically – cannot be argued away without causing damage. Fire remains extremely dangerous; this also applies when marriage is mishandled. Elfriede Hablé, an Austrian musician and aphorist, noted in that context: “It is not the world shaping these people, it’s these people who shape the world.”
