

The people have a right to get balanced information.

The people have a right to get balanced information.

Because of this existential need and the people's basic right to substantiated, well researched information, more and more people feel pressured into investing their leisure time for spreading uncensored news, as a remedy against the embezzlement of information and seriously biased reporting or against the out-right lies in media reporting.

The people have a right to get balanced information. Here is a practical illustration: Since 1999, when the US-initiated NATO attack started on Yugoslavia - concealed as humanitarian aid - the death rate has risen continually, year for year by 2.5 %. Daily a child is diagnosed with cancer. The cause is uranium ammunition shot in this war - carried out against international law. Radioactive micro-particles, also called "deadly dust", spread in the entire country, entering peoples bodies by the air they breath, via drinking water, or through food. Yet the population is not informed, neither by politicians nor by the media about the massive scale of the contamination! This would be a basic requirement however for personal decisions; like choice of residence, family planning or investments. This disinformation and cover-up strategy only benefits the NATO led by the USA which in this way will not be held accountable for their long-lasting war crimes. According to an independent study, this and similar incidents are certainly the reason that 77% of Americans accuse the mainstream media of spreading fake-news (in other words false, made-up reports). They are convinced by now that special interest groups purposely feed some false information into the news cycle. In this context more than half of those responding in this study testified that they feel that not the elected officials, but merely appointed government powers have too much influence on US internal affairs as well as US foreign policy. Already 200 years ago the German journalist, literature and theater critic Carl Ludwig Börne (1786–1837) expressed this, deplorable state of disinformation by politics and media very accurately: "The light which is spread by so-called official reports is often nothing more than an illusion leading us into swamps." Because of this existential need and the people's basic right to substantiated, well researched information, more and more people feel pressured into investing their leisure time for spreading uncensored news, as a remedy against the embezzlement of information and seriously biased reporting or against the out-right lies in media reporting.
